

What's this guy doing running for an office nobody's ever heard of?

RASIEJ

FOR PUBLIC ADVOCATE
CONNECTING NEW YORK CITY

The NYC Public Advocate's Office doesn't get much attention. In fact, few New Yorkers even know it exists. That's a shame, because the office has real power and an incredible potential for making a real difference in the lives of all New Yorkers. We just need a Public Advocate who is proactive and creative, with a clear mission for the office and a vision for the future.

ANDREW RASIEJ is just that kind of leader. As the founder of the nonprofit organization MOUSE, which connects our schools and students to technology, he knows what it will take to make sure our children succeed in the Information Age. After 9/11, he organized hundreds of technology professionals to help small businesses and schools in lower Manhattan, and then successfully lobbied Congress to create a National Tech Corps to aid in future disasters.

Now as a candidate for Public Advocate, Andrew is offering a bold new plan to provide low-cost Wi-Fi Internet for all New Yorkers. And he wants to reinvent the Public Advocate's office, to tap the full potential of our city's most underutilized resource—its own people—by connecting them together to make their voices heard.

VOTE FOR ANDREW RASIEJ in the SEPTEMBER 13 primary. For more information—or to help out—call 646-274-1502 or log on to WWW.RASIEJ.COM.

RASIEJ FOR PUBLIC ADVOCATE
CONNECTING NEW YORK CITY

